AN Hent 5%.

ADDRESS

TO THE

ELECTORS

OF THE CITY OF

CANTERBURY.

2 Y

THOMAS ROCH, CITIZEN.

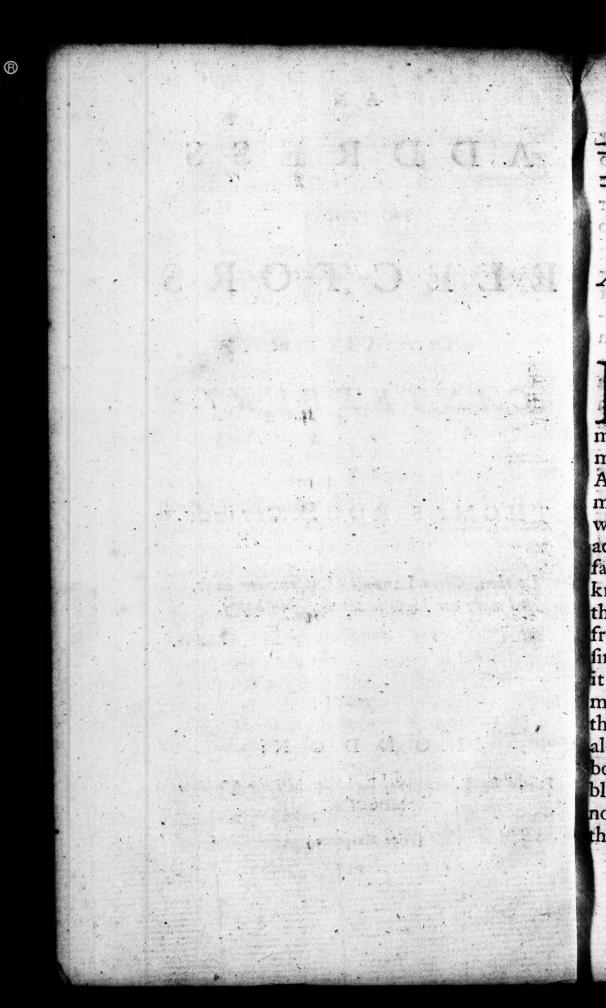

Do thou, Great LIBERTY! inspire our Souls,
And make our Lives in thy Possession happy.

Addison.

LONDON:

Printed for R. STEVENS. Bookfeller in Pater-nofter Row MDCCLXI.

(Price Six-pence.)

An Address to the Electors.

T is a notion I fear, too frequently rereceived among the labouring part of my Fellow-citizens, that the choice of members to represent us in parliament, is a matter of no material consequence to them. An opinion of this kind strongly imbib'd makes the heart easy of access, and the first warm folicitation to those who are above accepting a bribe for their vote, feldom fails of securing a promise; yet they all know we are called a free people, and though they may not consider the source from whence our freedom sprung, the bleffings we enjoy from it, the means by which it must be supported, and the methods that may be taken to destroy it; they value themselves as true born Englishmen, and cry aloud for liberty and property. The labourers in this kingdom indeed enjoy that bleffing in a much higher degree than the nobility, in comparison of the difference that there is in the two degrees of subjects B who live under a despotic government; for under fuch a government, the monarch who knows that by nature, all men are anxious for freedom, is obliged to invest a number of his nobility with power little inferior to his own, and they, and (what is more oppressive) their deputies, are stationed as viceroys or governors in different districts of his dominions, with armies at their command to strike terror and keep every one in subjection. As the number must be infinite and the expence immense to keep a discontented people under, and as the wealth of all nations must spring from the labourers, they are obliged to support the grandeur of their rigid task-massers, who have not only a power to fix a price upon their labours in their different manufactures, but can seize even the labourer himself, and fend him forth loaded with instruments of war, to fight their battles in distant regions, from whence there is but little prospect that they will ever return to their native land.

It has been observed by all travellers, that in such nations the nobility are immensely rich, and the labouring people miserably poor; indeed they must be so, when both their labours and persons are subject to command. Yet most of those nations have formerly tasted the sweet enjoyment of liberty, that darling blessing and passion of mankind; but when ambi-

k

ii

ta

0 n

O

k

Ca

CE

M

0

15

to

)-

-3

of

1-

in

6-

a th

rn-

ve

eir

ut

of

gi-

0-la-

in ch, in-

urs

Yet

ted

ing

nen biambition filled the hearts of their leading men, they looked on that plenty and freedom which the lower fort enjoyed, as an abridgment of their grandeur and riches, and a bar to their ambition: this fet them on schemes in their assemblies and senates, to concert fuch measures as might most safely answer their purpose, and where violent measures appeared doubtful and dangerous, they mingled threats with perfuafions, places and bribes; till, by stealing steps, they imperceptibly crept on the liberty of the people, who found themselves in chains before they discovered the cause of their captivity: then every lord grew absolute on his own land, and faw every neck bow to his ambition.

free-born Englishmen, compare the bleffings we enjoy with the wretched state of such a miserable people. In this kingdom the courts of judicature are open both to the king and the subject; the highest nobleman in the land has it not in his power to retain the lowest labourer in his service, without a mutual contract or agreement. Every man here has a power to fix a price on his own labour, and may seek for the best market in any part of the kingdom. No tax can be laid on food or raiment, or any necessary we use, without the consent of the majority of those who represent us in par-

The man who by time and application is bent at the loom, and he who bows with years and labour in the hop-garden, can fee his fons, that have been reared by his daily earnings (and which, perhaps, is all his worldly treasure) fafely stand by him as ornaments and supports to his declining state, without being in terror of having them forcibly wrested from him by any martial The meanest cottager in the kingdom is so absolute a lord in his own house, that (except from some violent trespass of the law) the greatest peer of the realm dares not force an entrance into his dwelling. These are but part of the privileges that the meanest free-born Englishman enjoys; and thefe may be held to the latest posterity, except you should have a parliament capable of giving them up, and a king willing to accept them.

Many of the evils under which this nation formerly groaned have been put in agitation by the influence of evil ministers, most of whom have been raised to that high station from the House of Commons; therefore as the bounty of our legislators hath given us the power of chusing our representatives, let us justly use this power, by endeavouring to send such men as we deem free from contention, avarice or ambition; such as

krow

a

n h

R

tl

b

fo th

fc

ti gl

po m

fc

it

I

h e

y

is

e, m

al

e, of

es

g.

he nd

ty,

ole

to

CO

on

on

of

ion

ore

ven

res,

ur-

om

OW

know it their duty and interest to preserve the crown to his present Majesty, under whose ancestors we have been raised to so high a pitch of glory, and fuch as will fludy every method to support his dignity in the utmost splendor; such as will tenderly endeavour to ease his majesty of those weighty cares, conflantly furrounding that royal head, ever anxious for the welfare of so numerous a people, and will most strictly maintain those privileges which every freeborn Englishman can justly claim, and which will most certainly perpetuate that noble spirit that has actuated our native strength and courage, to spread England's fame in so many different parts of the universe, and has brought such wealth and honour to the nation.

It has happened in national affemblies, that points of the highest consequence have been carried by a single vote, and perhaps some members of that assembly have gained their elections by the same majority. Therefore, fellow-citizens, you must not think your votes of trivial consequence, for many dangerous schemes have been put in execution by the eloquence and power of a single man; and as such a man may be appointed or prevented by a single vote, each man should give his vote in the most conscientious manner; for he who disposes of it with a venal view, if evil accrues from it, has as much to answer for, as he who makes the purchase to enable him to give the finishing stroke.

B

By the cultom in antient Rome, when any man offered himself a candidate for any office of trust or honour, which was to be gained by the good opinion and voices of the people, he was obliged for the space of two years before the election to appear in all publick places in a white garment, as an emblem of a fair and uniported reputation; and that the publick in that time might thoroughly know him, by inquiring into every part of his character: nor did they think it sufficient that they had a knowledge of the candidate, but thought it requifite that the candidate should have a knowledge of them, judging that those who were best acquainted and most familiar among them, would most earnestly endeayour by publick fervice to keep themselves high in publick effeem, for which reafon a law forbid the use of whisperers in their canvals, to tell them the names of the electors as they approached them: and whilst they were obedient to the law which regarded their election, Rome maintained and extended her power, but when great men for want of merit, found means to delude the people with publick entertainments and bribes, it let such men into the legislative power as regarded nothing but their own im-

m

li

n

1

O

C

Ŋ

ho

ive

my

of-

be

of

ace ear

as

ta-

me

ing

did

Pa

t it

e a

vho

12-lea-

ives

n a

an-

lecniiit

re-

and

men

lude

and

tive

im-

immediate interest; and they, by continuing to corrupt the hearts of the people, introduced luxury and its constant attendants, both and indolence among them, by which they were prepared by degrees for every mean submission, lost that noble spirit which raised them to such a wonderful state, and became subject to those whom before they had conquered.

Therefore, Fellow-citizens, as our general election is near, and as every gentleman who offers himself a candidate, offers every part of his character to publick scrutiny, we do both ourselves and the publick the highest injustice, if we omit making the nicest enquiry after every qualification and virtue they ought to be possessed of for so high a station and so great a trust.

Let every man arm himself against any persuasion, importunity and groundless promise, that may be urged to draw him from his natural inclination, and if we find it listicult to come at the real character of my of the candidates, let us form a adament of the men by the methods they se in endeavouring for and procuring our otes; and if either they or their trumpeers advance their fame, fortune, inclination, interest or power to serve us beyond a rabability, they give us fair warning to be nour guard; for if they deceive us in these points.

B

points, they will certainly do so in more material ones. On the other hand, if they should endeavour to prevail on any persons who have influence and power over any of the freemen to urge their commands, with threats to oblige such freemen to prostitute their votes, we may justly deem it dangerous to send such men to that grand assembly, where liberty and property are to be defended, if they take such methods to destroy them in supporting their own interests.

We should likewise form a judgment of them by the agents they employ; for when any man's bufiness extends beyond his own power of executing, his chief care is to get an agent or steward that wil steadily act according to bis instructions, knowing that he must be accountable for the agent's conduct in all fuch transactions as he employs him in. Next, as the magistrates ought to be a steady guide and example to people in every thing that concerns our national and city liberties, we should observe their motions with the utmost circumspection, and fuch of them as appear from unbiaffed principles to guide us with moderation and reason, we may justly deem the fathers of the city; but as it has been too customary on these occasions to procure (by means fometimes unknown) the magistrates and leading people of cities and boroughs, that they they may do the office of decoy ducks in feducing their neighbours.

If any such should appear among us, let.

us endeavour to avoid their footsteps.

ore

ley

ons

of

ith

ute

ge-

m-

be

to

in-

tof

nen

Wn

get

act

hat

nt's

em-

ght

ople

onal

heir

ion,

ffed

and

s of

nary

eans

and that they

We find on these occasions, a number of good and honourable men, who differ in their fentiments in regard to the choice of candidates, and from reasons best known to themselves, support their inclination with some warmth, yet with great decency; but there is another fort of people who thro' pretended loyalty and zeal, keep up that pernicious spirit of party, to such a degree that neighbours are frequently irreconcileable from election to election; and if we fearch into the motives, we shall frequently find these men are in possession or expectation of some publick employment, either for themselves or some indigent relation, whom indolence or incapacity have rendered incapable of getting a livelihood any other way; and though it might be more advantage to the publick if fuch men were paid their falaries without service, yet the ame interest which gets them in, geneally continues them; for, gentlemen, (fay they) we are a large family, and can command a great number of votes, and as we know you want our service to serve yourelves, it is but reasonable we should come n for a share of the advantage. kind of men, as they have a large stake depending, against which they hazard nothing of their own, generally play the game with all the crafty, low, infinuating arts they are capable of, on fuch as are to be won that way, or with the highest reflections, rancour and malice on those who are above such mean practices. If they know any necessitous person, who can be prevailed on for a little money, they are fure to retain him at the expence of the candidates. Almost every poor man who has a vote has hopes given him of being provided for either with an bospital's place or bead's man's, or fome other annuity. Any young Freeman who has a taffe to the army, navy, excise, or any publick employment, has affurances from them of immediate advancement, by being persuaded that they have such interest with the candidates, and that the candidates have fo strong an inclination to ferve every man that votes for for them, and such powerful influence at court, that scarcely are they free to refuse them; and though this cheat is almost as stale as the trade of guinea-dropping, yet there are still a number weak enough to be taken in by it.

I have made a calculation (which I think a moderate one) to shew such men the chance they stand for preferment: suppose on this general election, there are at least throughout the kingdom, in counties, cities,

des and boroughs, five hundred and fifty candidates that act on the plan of preferment, and that each of those, one with nother may have twenty agents or voteactors, to whom they have given promifes of places, on condition they fecure their election at an easy rate, which cannot be lone in a more reasonable way than by naking large promises. Then suppose that ach of those factors, by bartering that faid recious commodity for votes, Lecure anly wenty to their interest, we shall then find hat the furi total amounts to two hundred ind twenty thousand that are in expectaion of being maintained at the publick not your as direct pad. I at her maxiful as eney ton

I really cannot see (but I am not in the secret) show this can be done, except the whole army be disbanded, and the navy entrely discharged; and even then, they cannot provide a firelock, or a place before the mast for each of their friends, except hey get an order for raising a greater number of regiments, and putting more ships in ommission. - Visite of the exc.

ne ne

ts

be

C-

re

W

e-

110 li-

ed ed

d's

ng

vy,

id-

iev

nd

in-

for

at

use

as

yet

ink

the

ole

east

Ci-

ties,

Had I at present a good employment uner the government, I should think it my iterest to vote against any of these men who can procure such powerful interest by tting in parliament; for as they are candilates, we may suppose they are men of hoour, and their agents and vote-factors we may

C2

 Θ

may deem the same, and will see every thing they have promifed most punctually performed oif fo, I must expect to be turned out of my office, and perhaps see it divided into several parts to give them an oppositunity of fustaining their honour and fulfilling their engagements. But to those who are above those temptations, their measures are more desperate. If they know any man in trade whom they think weak enough to be frightened into their purposes, they carefully inquire where his interest in trade lies, then muster up all their forces to prevail on his customers to give him notice that they will withdraw their favours if he does not vote as directed. Their next care is to inquire for fuch tradefmen as have no leafes of their houses, and endeavour to prevail on their landlords to give them warning, though it may be attended with the ruin of them and their families. Thus they endeavour to raise themselves on the ruin of their neighbours, and always declare that they have no other view at heart, but the real good of king and country. Yet I could never hear any of these men advance a reafon that could gain credit in favour of the men whose interest they espouse; nor indeed-does it appear reasonable that they can, for if their friends were men of merit and honour, there would be no occasion for such methods to procure the election, nor would the

ng

ered

led

u-61-

ho

res

nan

to

reies,

vail

hat

oes

s to afes

vail ing,

n of

that the

ould

the

he candidates, if they had that regard for he welfare and interest of the city, which hey generally profess, suffer their agents nd vote-factors to act in so base a manner.

As my property is connected with the rest f my fellow-citizens in this affair, I think both my interest and duty to expose every njustifiable method that is put in practice prevent a free election; every infinuation nd groundless report that is formed with efign, to the favour or prejudice of any of he candidates; and every dangerous plot hat is laid to seduce and trepan the freehen out of their votes.

Lately, a few labouring men, to the club, and agreed that every man, before dmittance, should go through a ceremony which they call an oath, by holding up his n of and and declaring himself a freeman of the city, independent of all obligations in egard to elections, and would vote as the est of the company did. Mr. R. F-r, rewer, hearing of this fraternity, got him-If admitted, and made no scruple to quareafy himself by taking the oath; but being the impatient to discover his principles, he fixed inn two of the members, Mr. John Ledger, can, and Mr. Thomas Browne, and taking them and part, John, said he, to Ledger, I have a such theme to impart to you. I imagine that ould we shall be all together on the day of elec® tion; suppose I should take you and one of two more down to the poll-table, to vote as I shall direct you, and when you have so done, I shall sufficiently reward you; then I purpose that you shall return and acquaint the rest of the members how you have voted, and that you have been well rewarded, but you must not tell them bow much you have received. Let me have your opinion, John, how do you approve of my scheme? Why really, sir, said John, I do not like it.

Honest John prudently considered, that by consenting to this scheme, he must be the instrument of betraying his companions for a few guineas (or as they were to be mew'd up) if the election went greatly for or too much against Mr. F—r's inclination, they might all remain together unnoticed and uncalled on, as they then could be of no use.

This intended imposition so provoked John, that at their next meeting he discovered the plot to his brethren before Mr. F—r's face, which so provoked Mr. F—r, that he declared, if he had him in France, he would give him cause to repent of the information. Besides this method of obtaining numbers together, he used the following scheme for single articles. He applied himself to Abraham Bounds, an antient man worn out with labour in the hopgardens,

OT

ote

fo

en

int

ave

FO-

ów

out

my

do

2417

hat

be

ions

be

for

ina-

ino-

ould

Man San

oked

ifco-

Mr.

Mr.

m in

pent

od of

the

He

an-

hop-

dens, ardens, and told him, that if he would ote for Sir James and Mr. Mayne, that he fould procure him an hospital's place, and entioned the gentleman's name by whose terest he would procure it. Some of Aabam's friends judging that Mr. F-r. d neither intimacy nor interest with the intleman whose name he used, waited on d informed him of the promise that Mr. -- r had made in his name; and were formed by him, that he knew no fuch an as Abraham Bounds, nor had he given Ir. F-r leave to make use of his name fuch an occasion. Perhaps Mr. F--r ay imagine I go beyond a harmless freem in relating those facts: but certainly e fair dealer, who is injured by illicit actices, has a right (on proof) to give a blick information; and as there are a mber of my fellow-citizens in focial or neficial clubs, and as I apprehend there a number of defigning men, who, on present occasion, take every publick and vate method to feduce the freemen; I nk it my duty to apprise them, that they y be prepared to discover, and use such eivers as they deserve. Indeed fuch arts as these have a fair spect of succeeding, for the hopes of a pfortable subsistance for life must be a at temptation to a poor man in a declin-state. Sure such men must have great expectations for themselves, and no regard for the good opinion of their poor neighbours, or they would not mock their expectations in such a manner. How ridiculous have many of them appeared, when, after emblazoning the characters of those whose interests they espoused, they have cursed them in publick, when they found themselves deceived.

B

As I never applied for any interest but in trade, and as all the candidates are equal to me in that point, I shall take the freedom of right and custom, in declaring what I know, and have heard of each; and as I do it thus openly, let no man pretend to contradict what I affert, but in the same candid manner.

I shall begin with the men of Kent, and first Mr. Best, whose situation, family, connection and acquaintance, have made him familiar and well known to the citizens, as a gentleman of good education and understanding, a man of strict honour, a mos punctual observer of his word, and a prudent manager of his own affairs; which think, a strong recommendation to the management of a publick one. His partner it the election, Mr. Milles, born in our neigh bourhood, whose education and travels for some time past have made him a strange to us, but by the publick opportunities h has lately given us, we have no reason o roon footh to doubt that he inherits that honour and virtue which has raised every branch of that family in such high esteem among us

gard

igh-

ex-

licu-

hen,

those

have

ound

but equal

dom

hat I

as I

id to

fame

and

con-

him

s, as nder

mol

pru

ich

ma

eigh

s fo

ange

es h

n o

Next, Sir James Creed, a wealthy merhant of the city of London, who was a ranger to us till within three days of last lection, and after gaining it continued fo ill the present occasion required another pplication. This gentleman has a fair chaacter both in publick and private life: ome report he has dependance on the goernment in trade, but this I cannot think reasonable objection to any man of hohour, who is raised by fortune and spirit beyond temptation; and as there are numpers of useful and beneficial employments inder the government, it would give me pleasure to see such men have a reasonable hare of them who procure their elections with reputation, and fill their stations in parliament with loyalty and honour. Then we might expect to see the offices under hem filled with men capable of discharging heir duty to the general advantage of the publick. Indeed, I believe his interest has eceived no addition from the reports which Mr. F—r has spread of his being disap-pointed in places, which, he said, were promised him for his relations, which he has refented by making frequent declarations that he never more would appear in But his favour; and told Mr. Atlen, Mr. West, and Mr. Brooks, that he had been used so ill by the party, that he never more would appear in their troop. Mr. Atlen, who knew him, doubted what he said, and the other replied, if I don't for the future ride in your troop, Mr. Allen, never more believe R. P. But if after saying so, he should appear in the interest of Sir James, I think it will be doing that gentleman service, by making what he has said to his prejudice appear doubtful, and, I think, that Sir James has done as much as they deserve who voted for him on such motives.

- The next is Sir James's partner, Mr. Mayne, a North-Britain; but this can be no objection to his filling a feat in parliament, or any other publick office that he has integrity, moderation and capacity to fill, as it is well known that this part of Great-Britain, in proportion to its mumbers, has furnished his majorty with as many good and uleful subjects as any other part of his majesty's dominions : but I make it a material objection to his representing our city in parliament, where men of known honour in our own county and neighbourhood have offered themselves, from whom we may reasonably expect a more tender regard for our interest. This gentleman's very name till lately was unknown to us. But eft,

ofo

bluc

iew

her

ieve

lhe

mes,

nan his

that erve

Mr.

e no ent,

in

as

eaters.

nany

part

elit

out

our-

hom

nder

anis

But

us if, according to the scripture rule, by eir fruits you may know them; the first offoms that opened in his favour were r. Hunter, hop-merchant of the city of orden, and Mr. Abraham Rye, dealer and spman, of the city of Ganterbury, and hat they and some others have reported of m on this occasion, ought at this time to most seriously considered; for if, as they we represented, that he is capable of adncing those who vote for him, or prejusing those who vote against him, I think it fficient (as times go) to gain an election, most parts of England. If he has no the power (which I really believe he has t) I am far from charging Mr. Mayne ith giving such instructions to those who eve saported them not But I am confident at feveral who have appeared as his lends have in a most artful manner an pted their perfusions and promises in ch various shapes as they judged most oper 149 work on the pallions, defines of cesties of the people and have by such eans drawn in a number to promise their tess therefore as a citizen. I should think yielf guilty of a great omittion if I negsted laying before my fellow-citizens such ets of the proceedings, as I can justly ove, what they may have an opportunity inquiring into the truth, or judging of he probability; and feriously consider whe-D 2 (cheo ther they ought to think themselves engaged, if it appears that the means which were used to engage them were used to deceive them.

I cannot conceive on what prefumption Mr. Hunter could offer us a person to represent us in parliament, except the merit of the fervice he has done his king and country in the bop trade; but he undertook the jobb, and in the following manner opened the scene.

He told Mr. Hopkins Fox, a man of interest, credit and fortune, that the citizens had now an opportunity of doing themselves great fervice by accepting Mr. Mayne, who intended to offer himself to represent them in parliament: that Mr. Mayne was a man of great merit and fortune; that he had been preceptor to his MAJESTY, and that his MAJESTY was greatly improved in mercan-tile affairs, and thoroughly a judge of the ballance of trade, and from his instruction; that Mr. Majne was a man of great parts, had great interest at court, and was an intimate friend and companion of Mr. PITT!

Several flories of this kind being forcad abroad, expectations ran high in every quarter of the town. If any good woman went to tell her neighbour the good and joyful tidings, she was prevented, by, lord neighbour! I am glad you are come, I have great news to tell you: they fay our KING's fchool,

enhich de-

tion renerit and

zens elves who hem

man had it his canthe ion: arts, n inrT!

oread every oman and lord have NG's parliament, and that the KING will do withing that he alks of him.

Mr. Hunter having thus laid the fountion, he left his very humble fervant Mr. braham Rye to purchase proper materials r raising this candidate to a member of rliament.

When Mr. Rye opened bis commission, ir. Hunter's credentials appeared very most, for Mr. Rye magnified Mr. Mayne's fluence and power at court in so many vaous shapes, that hopes might be enterined of having a great part of the Court alender silled up with the freemen of Cansabury.

Things being thus prepared, he entered criously into business; and it was a matter f no small amusement to the citizens, who new the jobbs in which he is generally ngaged, to hear him barter for a represenative in parliament. He proposed that bis fiend, notwithstanding his being a North-Britain, should take down St. Andrew's hurch, though even the church of his tuelar faint, and rebuild one in a more comenient place, pay off the work-house dehr, wild barracks, or, in short, do any thing hat might make us a happy people. The the were to be employed, the naked cloathd, the hungry fed, and any rich candidate hat opposed him sent empty away; and to any than to oppose his friend; he informed us, that great not manders both by sea and land, dook yands, side. werd in his interest that a steat general, whose name he publickly mentioned had, or would send circular letters to every freeman of Cantene bury in the army, to appear on the daylof election, and inote for Mas Mayne, that another great person whose name he like wise mentioned, had nine in the train of artillery, albat Mr. Mayne's service

Mr. Barnard Agglebon, a freeman of this city, who last a hand in the same engagement and ship where the brave captain Cornwall fell, and who has, on that account, and amounty from the government, being of a different interest. Mr. By said ha should be bridged to and that he would take ears that a great gun stould be fixed at him for that purpose the like wife declased, that if Mr. Lighte did not vote that way, his form who is now a lightenants should never be saifed from that station at him of the enough impire hopes or strike terror. Ms.

Migne made his appearance, was received, and admitted a freeman by the corporation which he entertained in a genteel manners and was a man of such address, that he force means or other, several of the aldermen appeared engaged in his interest. He can-

red,

pa

et-

he

PARE

eng

tois

Hat

ko√ of this

See a

tain

unt,

gof

eare

v fan

85-15

10n

Men

Brick

thes

Ms

ved,

tion

BEET

KHOT

des,

caninvalled the every, gave kiffer, promifes, and all filver to leveral poor freemens wives ened that he was perforally known to his ovest viandindimate with ford Bute, which Ined to confirm what Mi. Rye had allheed, and gave frong expectations that would (as he promised) procure a diff dige for two fons of William Johncock. w in his majorty's dervice in Germany by on the whole, went through the cereony in a very decent matther, and departed. ment confels that some of the freemen are apt, upon these publick occasions, to ale impertition inquiries, as, who is he? at is he? and how shall we know he can all thefe great things? but Mr. Abraham e, who pretended to know all, remained agus sassanany has another for every

Mr. Mayne gave a convincing proof of the at regard he had for our city, by purchage two hundred pounds worth of plate of William Gray, fon of William Gray, is our present right worthipful mayor: that could not be done with a view to a his worthip, for every body knows he stand hindere man, and always votes acding to the dictates of reason and confcier. His worthip indeed has told several ple, that Mr. Mayne promised him, that majes to though know, that we are a very loyal

London with our city address, Mr. Mayne let him know, that his MAJESTY was apprised of his approach, and assured him that he would meet with a most gracious reception; by which his worship must certainly think that Mr. Mayne was no inconsiderable person a court: and Mr. Rye, to convince the public that be is no inconsiderable person with Mr. Mayne, informed me in the presence of number of freemen, that he was present a the junction of Sir James and Mr. Mayne and that it was by his advice, persuasion and instruction, that Mr. Mayne joined Si James.

When this junction was made, all hand were set to work to acquaint the public the D-e of N-e was in their interest, and commissioned officers and volunteers appeared in every quarter of the city, and in the neighbouring towns and villages where free men resided, to give fresh expectations.

Mr. James Butler, hosier, at the sign of the almost naked boy in Burgate, appeare as a vote-factor, and warm in their interest and in bartering expectations for the vote of a person at Margate, told him that Mayne was brother-in-law to Mr. Pitt, an nephew to Lord Bute, so, Daniel, says he you see we are very near the belm: Mr. But ler owns he said so, and declared to me, the

it to ze let

ed of

vould

; by

tha

on a

ubli

Mr

of

ent a

Layne

afion

d Si

hand

ic th

, an

pear

n th

free

S.

ign o

peare

terest

ote d

t M t, and

ys h

. But

e, the

knew nothing to the contrary; and as he a man of a fair character, it appears that r. Mayne is as represented, or that Mr. ter has been greatly deceived.

Mr. Abraham Rye, who was present (as he d) at the junction of Sir James Creed and r. Mayne, informed several people that r. Mayne told him that he had not been at art for the space of eight or nine days; d on his asking the reason, Mr. Mayne anered him; why, Mr. Rye, as Sir James d I were not joined, I did not care to see his ajesty, for I knew the first question he would we asked, would have been concerning my nterbury election. This, I suppose, was to avince the public, how earnest his MAJES—was in Mr. Mayne's interest, and to prete him for what followed.

When this was sufficiently spread over the Mr. Rye appeared in a large company, addressing himself to Mr. William Fransurgeon and apothecary; Sir, said he, I pose your father, you, and your brothers, in our interest. Mr. Francis answered in the negative. Sir, said Mr. Rye, you e a brother a midshipman in the King's serie in the navy. Undoubtedly, said Mr. ncis. Sir, said Mr. Rye, unless your fabe in our interest, he must remain in that ion, for those families who are not in our interest, their sons or relations who are in the King's service will surely have fet on them.

terelt,

A BLACK MARK

B

The citizens who heard Mr. Rye pronounce this fentence, must certainly imagina it impossible to give an addition to his Filth or they would have rolled him thro' everkennel in the city.

A black mark!

nipping words, fellow-citizens! fufficien to blast the very thoughts of liberty.

I have observed before, that agents gene rally act according to their instructions, but am in hopes Mr. Mayne has not instructe Mr. Abraham Rye to threaten us in this manner; if he has, and his power and in clination are figured in Mr. Rye's words, am concerned he has been his Majesty's pre ceptor, and should be forry to see such man advanced in power, lest I should have A BLACK MARK fet on me to answer ever purpose he required, and be obliged to ben my neck lower to his ambition than m spirit would admit of. If these are his sen timents, it does not appear that he is either a friend or companion of Mr. PITT; an if that great minister be his brother-in-law and lord Bute his uncle, (which I doubt) am confident that neither of them will fur nish him with branding irons for so black purpose. Tu pronagin Filth even in the

gene

but

ficien

ructe
thi
d in
ords,
's pre

fuch hav
ever

in m is fer eithe

; an n-law ubt) li fur

lack

Tur

Turn back, fellow-citizens, and read over the description I have given you of the ate of those unhappy men who live under absolute government; then seriously rect on the methods that have been used procure this gentleman his election; his ealth and power have been magnified in ch a manner, that the expectations of me men are raised to such a pitch, that ney stand at nothing to advance themselves, y endeavouring to gain his election. A danerous scheme has been laid to trepan a umber of citizens out of their votes, and any fuch, I fear, are practifed; so many oor freemen have been seduced to promise heir votes, by affurances of hospital places, hat if two thirds of the houses in a parish rere fold to endow the rest, there would ot be room for their reception. That any expect better places, is publickly nown by those who have declared what ney have been promised; and if expectaon be sweeter than enjoyment, I can venre to fay they will not be dispossessed of heir hopes by possession; but to those who re fixed in business, and have no such exectations, they make use of desperate meares: several have been warned out of heir houses. Mr. Abraham Rye, the prime inister in this affair, to shew a good exmple, has told Mr. Worsley, who occupies house of his, (which by the landlord may be judged a poor one) if he did not vote for Sir James and Mr. Mayne, he must turn out. The man offered to vote for one of them; but he must vote for both, or out was the word. I know not how Mr. Worsley intends to behave on this occasion, but for my part, I would sooner expose my naked body to the universal canopy, than shelter it under the roof of such a wretched landlord.

E 2

- Several poor people have been threatened; and some actually turned out of employment. We are informed that commanders both by sea and land, governors of the dock-yards, &c. whom we maintain to fupport our privileges, will endeavour to prevent a free election, by giving the word to those under them; and if such persons as Mr. Loftie and Mr. Francis are threatened to have BLACK MARKS fet on their children, how long may men in a labouring state call themselves free-born Englishmen? how long will they be able to command their votes, their labour, their children, or themselves, if such men as these get into power? perhaps they think proper to give us a specimen beforehand of what they intend, for this feems to be a new method of gaining elections.

When Scipio Nafica appeared for the place of Cerule Ædile, on shaking the hands of one of the electors, and finding it hard and callous.

dost use to walk upon your hands?" this the behaviour in a man who stood candate for an office of consequence, so different the noble spirited Romans, that he this election by it. But had he, or any his friends who appeared in his faur, presumed a power over the senate to ocure places for such as would vote for m, or set BLACK MARKS on those who sused, I believe their resentment would thave given them leisure to have mounted ch men on the Tarpeian rock *.

As I before observed, whilst they contied unawed and unbribed by the candites, Rome maintained and extended its wer: and may such a noble spirit, unded by decency, inspire all my selw-citizens; and as the glory, honour and ealth of both KING and people depend it; may we ever shew such a generous sposition for liberty, as may awe all ranks d degrees of men whatsoever, from atnpting to controul us in the choice of our ndidates, or daring to threaten us with ACK MARKS.

A rock in ancient Rome, from which persons guilty of e certain crimes were thrown headlong down.

FINIS.

for turn e of out Mr.

my than ched

ion,

oloyolers the fup-

pred d to as as ened chiluring men? nand

into give y inod of place ds of d and llous, allert, to tell a comment of the contract of  the transfer that the contract of the factor Las Y have salar man a submoderal sela THE OF CHARLES IN STEW HELDE STADE en total war build of our on wasse the his election by the indicate the the problem of the character state in er commission of the Many and . The second state of the second second CON COME TO THE ACT DOES IN MET IN ACT bloom respectations is evolut Communicy of Constitution and the Constitution of the Constitution the state of the tenth of the first dependent of the second section of the second to to sell and the least the man to the Francisco Description Sand Sand to do the went of the 1 to 100 with the ment by the form The said which the but were ... A too or a read with modificate the second of the second of the Thought in the territory of the state of Simple of Spines to Committee SERVICE TO THE SERVICE.

®